

I primarily use my cell phone so that I don't have to put up with unwanted calls trying to sell me phone services, aluminum siding, or credit cards. I recently reinstalled a homephone so that we could use it for emergency purposes, if necessary. Ninety-nine percent of the calls that I receive are from people trying to sell me something. I feel obliged to answer the phone when it rings because family or friends may need to call me for some important purpose. Inevitably, I end up listening to some canned speech about a product. I believe this is a total invasion of privacy. As soon as I finish this comment I am going to put my name on the no call list. I hope elected officials do not 'cave in' to special interests over the wishes of their constituency. A person's home should not be continually under attack from panderers.
